

OREGON'S SENATORS

The Senators from Oregon do not seem to stand well in the estimation of the Oregonian, and whatever they do or omit doing will I presume that under of publication. The Oregonian is a great paper and its editor is the chief writer on the Pacific Coast. To have its influence greater than that of any public man would be to have his official acts fully presented to his constituents though it does not appear to diminish the influence at Washington of Messrs. Chamberlain or Bourne or prevent them from securing for Oregon's water ways the most liberal appropriations. The River and Harbor Bill was intended in the Senate by Oregon's senator in the interest of this State, and the Oregonian, in commenting on this fact, inferred that the amendments were secured through what is known as senatorial courtesy and that the increases secured would not stand in the conference committee. But they did, and now there is no doubt Senators Bourne and Chamberlain have done good work as to the matter of appropriations, and were they the Oregonian's instead of Oregon's senators that paper would be sounding the loud hew-gag in their praise and calling attention to the wonderful influence they exercise in the councils of the Nation. Instead of that it is doing its utmost to discredit them, both at home and in Washington, and all because it does not approve of the method by which they were elected, even though, so far as Chamberlain is concerned, it and its assembly coterie, were directly responsible for the result. The truth is that Oregon's senators are able and resourceful men, and the interests of the State, as far as non-partisan measures are concerned, could not be in better hands. The editor of the Mist did not vote for Jonathan Bourne in the primary, and has never voted for George Chamberlain and never expects to, but the people of the State know that Bourne is a resourceful and capable man, and Chamberlain's record of success in politics prior to the adoption of the direct primary and Statement No 1 is proof of the strong hold he has upon the affections of the people of this State. Eastern senators and Eastern papers and magazines of national reputation recognize his ability and it remains for the Oregonian to decry him and attempt to minimize his influence for the good of the State at Washington, for no other reason than because he was elected by the people by the method adopted by the Republican voters of the State. It hypocritically laments that the direct primary has resulted in sending a democratic Senator from this Republican State. Yet it did not hesitate to admit that the majority for Chamberlain was secured by the opposition to Mr. Cade of those eminent gentlemen who now assume to possess all the wisdom of the party, and who, with the Oregonian for their mouthpiece, have engineered and will control the Portland State Convention, or assembly. The course of these insurgents in the past has given the Republican voters of the State just reason to distrust them, and nothing that they can offer except submission to the letter and spirit of the law, will promote harmony in the party. The so-called assembly will be absolutely controlled by the Portland insurgents. According to the apportionment of delegates they will have over one fourth of the entire membership but in fact, as many counties will not be represented and proxies will not be recognized, Portland's 350 delegates may be an absolute majority and will certainly dictate the nominees.
